Entrepreneurship in the Classroom and Beyond

The image shows a promotional graphic for a podcast episode. On the left, a tablet displays a photo of Jennifer Stubblefield, a woman with short brown hair and glasses, wearing a blue sleeveless top and white pants, sitting on a patterned chair. To the right of the tablet, the text reads: 'CERTIFIED' in large green letters with a checkmark, 'CERTIPOINT EDUCATOR PODCAST' below it, 'EPISODE 37' in green, and 'ENTREPRENEURSHIP IN THE CLASSROOM AND BEYOND WITH JENNIFER STUBBLEFIELD' in white. Below this is a green button that says 'Available on'. At the bottom, there are logos for 'Listen on Google Podcasts', 'Spotify', and 'Listen on Apple Podcasts'. A green bar at the very bottom contains the website 'www.certipoint.com'.

Many schools don't have courses in entrepreneurship, so most students don't learn about being an entrepreneur until college or even when they decide to start their own company. With an ever-changing economic landscape, it's more important now than ever to teach students these skills before they leave the classroom behind.

In this week's podcast episode, we're bringing in veteran teacher Jennifer Stubblefield to have talk about how she used her existing business courses to teach entrepreneurship skills.

Continued...

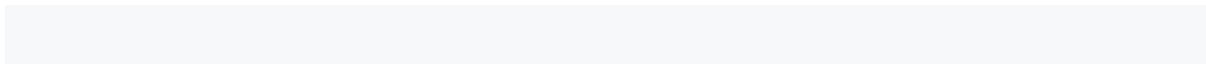

She also dives into the Entrepreneurship and Small Business (ESB) certification, what resources she leveraged to teach entrepreneurship, and how her students are using their entrepreneurship skills after graduating. You'll be inspired by these stories of success, trust us.
